The Nashville Film Festival today announced its plans to shift to a virtual model for this yearâ??s event, which will take place from October 1-7, 2020. This yearâ??s festival will be the most accessible version to audiences yet, and both filmmakers and film lovers will be given unique opportunities to connect and enjoy digital screenings, panels, filmmaker Q&As, musical performances, and other original content online.

The festival altered its format to ensure it could produce a safe and enjoyable experience for all attendees in light of evolving health & safety protocols related to the coronavirus. The virtual festival will feature more than 200 films and include Creators Conference panels, Q&As and other exclusive content that will bring the magic of the Nashville Film Festival to attendees from the comfort and safety of their homes. As part of the new format, â??virtual socialâ?• opportunities will connect audience members directly with filmmakers and other film fans to discuss their favorite movies.

Jason Padgitt, NashFilm Executive Director

â??Like many other live events around the world, weâ??ve had to adapt to prioritize the safety, comfort and well-being of our community,â?• said Jason Padgitt, Nashville Film Festival executive director. â??This year has given us an opportunity to think creatively about how we can make the festival more accessible and innovative than ever before, and we are excited to deliver a memorable experience that honors all the reasons weâ??ve become known as a premier event for content creators and film enthusiasts.â?•

The festival, which is now in its 51st year, will continue to deliver the worldâ??s best independent films and provide a showcase for Tennesseeâ??s most talented filmmakers. The full program and film lineup will be announced in August 2020.
