Philippine trans people, Scandinavian reindeer herders and a romantic comedy about the Holocaust dominated the closing ceremony of the 29th Tokyo International Film Festival on Thursday.

The ceremony at Ex Theater Roppongi opened appropriately enough with awards to individuals who furthered domestic cinema this year, including Godzilla, who appeared on stage to accept an award for the year's big hit, Shin Godzilla, on the 62nd anniversary of the first Godzilla film released in 1954.

Tokyo Gov. Yuriko Koike, decked out in a matching black pantsuit and fedora, awarded the Grand Prix to The Bloom of Yesterday, a provocative comedy about two Holocaust researchers — one German, the other French — who battle over history while falling in love.

However, the top award didn't arouse as much audience excitement as Koike's announcement that next year's TIFF budget would be even larger than this year's, thanks to additional government expenditure for the 2020 Tokyo Olympics.

Another festival winner was "Die Beautiful," a Philippine film about a transgender woman who dies while being crowned for a beauty pageant. In addition to winning the Audience Award, the film's leading man, Paolo Ballesteros, won the festival's best actor award, although presenter Mabel Chung made the point that Ballesteros could have easily won either the "best actor or best actress" prize.

The best actress award went to Lene Cecilia Sparrok, the teen star of the Swedish-Danish-Norwegian co-production, Sami Blood, which examines the discrimination that the indigenous Sami people of northern Scandinavia suffered, and which also won the second place Jury Prize. Sparrok, a reindeer herder in real life, was so overwhelmed that she lost her English-language capability and conveyed her gratitude in Sami.

The best artistic contribution prize went to Mr. No Problem, a gorgeously shot and staged comedy of manners, financed and produced by the Beijing Film Academy, about a Chinese farm and its impossibly agreeable manager that takes place in 1943, when Japan and China were at war.

During his Grand Prix speech, jury head Jean-Jacques Beineix stressed that what unified the films he and his colleagues judged this year was their rejection of a "globalist mindset." All of the films "accepted our differences" and proved that "a universal cinema does not exist."

The fact that there were no Japanese winners in the main competition categories wasn't lost on local reporters. During the post-ceremony news conference, one Japanese journalist asked Beineix how he "discussed" the two Japanese entries with his colleagues.

"As you know, our discussions have to be kept secret," Beineix replied, evincing a wave of laughter. In any case, Poolsideman, which depicts the lonely life of a Tokyo pool lifeguard, won the Japan Splash prize for domestic indie films, and director Hirobumi Watanabe openly wept on stage while accepting the award.
